IRELAND.

The Miseries of the Wretched Tenants of Tipperary.

No Aid to Be Expected from England—Rising Eviction-Giving Bistro.

Special Correspondence of The Chicago Tribune.

DUBLIN, Jan. 21.—The English, Ireland, Jan. 21.

Poverty, hunger and disease rule the South

Riding of Tipperary, on the Galtee of the South

Riding of Tipperary, they riot unrestrainedly. Gaunt, living skeletons, unkempt and unshaved, whose bodies exude the hideous smell of famine.

Men, women and children face at the wretched overgrown huts where they call home. And holes they only too truly call home. And an unsavory fox that burrows in the hills around them has a less ill-smelling place of refuge.

Where is the man of Tipperary now? Has the days of Davy Crockett disappeared since the days of Davy Crockett, the "mountain" men and their gallant ways?

Tall is his form, his heart is warm.

His spirit is light as any fairy.

That evens the hills and the storm.

They are not on the Galtee, at any rate. In stead, there is a starry road, studded in mental and physical growth.

But, like the others, are the case of these poor men not some situation owing to the fact of the agent of Mr. Nathaniel Buckley (landlord), a truly unpopular man, having been SHOT AT AMONG THE HILLS.

The driver happened to be killed, but neither the agent nor the two policemen protecting him had any such demand to make a severe fight.

Only one of the attacking party was killed, and he paid the penalty of his ill-considered plan of revenge with his life. He was hanged soon after in Cork, without, however, disclosing who his companions were, and these are still at large. The man was seized and made the most of by the English press, which, according to custom, ignored the doings of the Irish peasantry, their treacherous

"hedge warfare," and general baseness.

Again the old mass correspondence and cross complaints were to be heard from the press that from the Col or Catholic no good could come. Tipperary, typically Celtic or Catholic, was the scene of the most sanguinary conflict. But there was one bright, clear-witted man in the neighboring county who took up the cause of the peasants, and the painless solution of the difficulties was found in John J.

Cassidy (the "Galtee Boy"), now Conroy of Cassidy. It was not until he came forward that the other leaders, Commissioners and reporters to no end traveling over the different parts of the country, the same principles of justice were responsible for the same
